FOREWORD

Henry Davenport is a native of Boston, Mass. He is a graduate of Ecole des Beaux Arts in Paris and also studied for two years in the Julian Academy as well as in the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston. He has been a pupil of Charles W. Hawthorne and George Elmer Browne. He is now a member of the faculty of Yale University holding the professorship in the history of art and in the teaching of painting.

Mr. Davenport may be said to be a colorist and a romanticist. His pastels are full of superlative depth and sonorous color, and display a notable vein of fancy and invention and imagination. He uses a dark paper almost black for his pastel work and lets the paper count for a great deal in the color scheme which is singularly sensuous and reverberating. His subjects are romantic and picturesque and extremely strong in their appeal to the imagination. They have a wonderful visionary quality in which the sombre splendor of the color plays an important part. One feels in them a convincing reality that is far removed from stark realism.
